4.2 Program Learning Outcomes

The Master's Programme "Land Management and Land Tenure" is a response to an increasing demand for scientific knowledge and practical skills on topics related to land management, land tenure and environmental risk management in rural and urban areas, particularly in developing countries. This demand calls for both research and practical expertise to be developed and strengthened. The orientation of the master's programme is thus aligned toward the achievement of balanced scientific and professional knowhow.

Within the frame of the Faculty of Civil, Geo and Environmental Engineering, the study programme contributes to the development of innovative solutions in the complex field of land management and cultural as well as professional openness and collaboration. Furthermore, through the engagement of outstanding experts in the different fields related to land management, the masters programme aims at transferring knowledge and skills which comply with the best international standards and values or principles and which imply a strong commitment to the improvement to the society as a whole.

The objective of this study programme is not only realized through training of international experts, but also through research, particularly through the master's theses. The research conducted ranges from topics such as land policies and land and water governance to land use planning processes leading to adequate environmental risk management policy frameworks and the conditions necessary for establishment of adequate land administration systems in developing countries. Other fields of work include, for example, rural and urban development, land information systems and land disputes resolution, food security and land tenure systems.

The academic degree "Master of Science (MSc) in Land Management and Land Tenure" qualifies the graduates for professional work and scientific research in the broader field of land management. Furthermore, the graduates are able to work in the field of land management with public and private sector and are in a position to manage, administer, organize, moderate, facilitate, develop technical solutions and provide scientific analysis in the context of land management processes. Therefore, graduates are trained to become "change agents" in their respective positions and the broader field of land management. In other words, the graduates are "well-grounded specialized generalists".
